After many tedious hours spent attempting to build a working vessel, I concede defeat to From the Depths. Mastering the basics (or just barely grasping them) can turn into a quest of monumental proportions. Unless of course you're an engineering god/demi-god. in the end though, I had a blast with the battling part of the game as it's immense fun watching vehicles duke it out using an array of weapon types. the units designed and featured in the campaign (praise be their creator's engineering prowess) had me really impressed, anyone who can make such a creation is a boss. TLDR: Not my cup of tea, however I see the appeal to those who want to build and battle.. Probably one of my most favorite games I've ever gotten, I highly recommend it, as another review said (The one that convinced me to get the game) "The fun of destroying someone else's legos" It's an amazing game, and a lot of games you get tired of after a little while, FTD is not one of the, I think my almost 400 hours speaks for itself about my enjoyment of the game.. Fun to play but the UI is a little overwhelming. After 413.7 hours, i can finally say i built my first good looking, useful starter ship.. Probably one of my most favorite games I've ever gotten, I highly recommend it, as another review said (The one that convinced me to get the game) "The fun of destroying someone else's legos" It's an amazing game, and a lot of games you get tired of after a little while, FTD is not one of the, I think my almost 400 hours speaks for itself about my enjoyment of the game.
